1. Introduction

According to Medina (2001), the family is a familiar topic but there is a need to step back & study it in critical & scientific lenses as personal experiences alone could be very limited & may not be representative of other families in the society. From here on I will try to extrapolate the author's ideas on this particular subject.

The family have certain characteristics:

- As a social group, it is universal. It is a significant element in man's social life. Nowadays, changes in the family (e.g. from traditional structure to non-traditional structure as will be discussed later) are happening brought about by the changing economic climate & technological advancements but it has remained a basic institution in the society.
- It is the first social group to which an individual is exposed. Family relationships last a long time & as "individual's earliest & longest experience in living takes place in a family setting."
- "The family affects the individual's social values, disposition, & outlook in life. The family is the source of the individual's ideals, aspirations, & basic motivations."
- The family is said to be the link between an individual & the larger society. In this way we can say that a person's interaction &/or attitude inside the family unit affects or is a determinant in how that person interacts in the community that his family belongs.
- Logically, from the assertions above, the family is understood to provide continuity of social life. It is a major agent in the transmission of culture which also affects &/or reflects the culture of the society.
